NEW PICTURES AND
THE NEW GALLERY
1923

FOREWORD BY JAMES N. ROSENBERG

PRIVATELY PRINTED FOR
THE NEW GALLERY
600 MADISON AVENUE, NEW YORK
AUTUMN, MCXXIII

FOREWORD

THIS book, which contains reproductions of fifty-eight of the one hundred and twenty-two pictures sold from November, 1922, to May, 1923, at The New Gallery, is published, partly for the members of The New Gallery Art Club, partly to indicate the aims and characteristics of art of the present time. The New Gallery has been frankly an experiment to ascertain whether there is a public ready to take an interest in contemporary pictures which are something more than slick and servile patterns of the past. The history of pictorial art of the nineteenth century is the time-worn tale of the worth-while men despised and ridiculed and coming to recognition only in their old age or after their death. In very recent years, a more tolerant and inquiring spirit has perhaps begun to emerge. Though scoffed at by the dull majority to which anything new is absurd or dangerous, painters have not been obliged to ape time-worn tradition. Ever since the great Armory Show of 1913, the path-finders, the searchers, the blazers of the way, have had an audience, small though it is, and it is primarily for this audience that this little book has been prepared.

The New Gallery puts forward no claims of greatness for the pictures here reproduced. No such claim can, should or need be made. Time, the patient and only potent critic, will, in the fullness of years, render the verdict. This much may, however, be said,—that the pictures here reproduced are fairly representative of a number of the tendencies and drifts of art to-day. It has been a source of regret that not all of the pictures sold during the season of 1922-23 could be here presented and that those reproduced could be shown in this book only in black and white, instead of with the full range of brilliant color which so many of the originals possess.

While it is not the purpose of this foreword to climb into the seat of dogma or authority and enter into a critique as to the pictures which follow, it will, however, serve a useful purpose to say a few words concerning the painters and their work—though many of them are already so well known as hardly to need introduction.

¶ Guy Bertin is a Pole, painting in Paris.

¶ Biddle is an American. He has had several one-man shows in America and Europe.

¶ Burliuk is the first of Russian post-impressionists.

¶ Chapin is an American. Though he has definitely arrived, he had scarcely ever exhibited publicly until The New Gallery gave him a one-man show.

¶ Chériane is one of that interesting and vital group of Parisian women of whom Marie Laurencin is the leader.

¶ Derain, Raoul Dufy, Matisse, Vlaminck, are leaders in contemporary French art.

¶ De Winter, Fiene, Greenstein, Marin and Sheeler are Americans. As to the work of Fiene, reference is made to the admirable monograph in the younger artists' series. As to the work of Greenstein, reference is made to a recent critical essay by George S. Hellman, appearing in The Menorah Journal. Marin has exhibited widely and critics agree in placing his water colors in the front rank. Sheeler's excellent work is widely known.

¶ The work of G. Roosevelt Dick, Edith Haworth, Lorna Reid, Katherine Schmidt, gives ample proof that the women are doing their worthy share in contemporary art.

¶ Jean Dufy is a brother of the more famous Dufy.

¶ Fotinsky is a Russian painting in Paris. Several of his canvases were shown at the exhibition of Russian paintings in The Brooklyn Museum in the early winter of 1923.

¶ Friedman is an American, a study of whose paintings over a period of years would indicate to a sceptical public that modernism is not a mere pose or escape from the rigors of careful, academic craft and draftsmanship.

¶ Few men have been so acclaimed both on the continent and here as the celebrated Russian Grigoriev. Of his work Christian Brinton lately said in a critical analysis, "With him art is not an escape from reality. It is, as with his spiritual parent Dostoevsky, a courageous conquest of reality."

¶ Hartl is a Frenchman living in America, whose work shows the analytic and searching French mind.

¶ Marsden Hartley, an American, is widely known. His outright auction sale several years ago, of some two hundred canvases, at The Anderson Galleries, was a courageous innovation. That sale was a great adventure. Hartley took the risk of finding no bidders and of a consequent fiasco. The success of the sale should have gone far toward showing contemporary painters that there is a public ready to believe in the painter if the painter will believe in his public.

¶ As to Kisling, a Pole residing in Paris, reference is made to Clive Bell's book, "Since Cézanne." Kisling's studio in the Rue Bara is empty of canvases, though he is a painter of unflagging zeal. Amateurs in Paris avidly collect his work.

¶ Kostini is a Russian. Much of his work is cubistic and he was the first of painters to show work of that character in Constantinople, whence he has just lately come.

¶ Lado di Goudiachvili, better known as Lado, is a young Prince of Georgia, commanding increasing respect in Paris.

¶ Medgyes is a brilliant young Czecho-Slovakian, residing in Paris. His one-man show at The Vogel Galleries in Paris in 1922 brought him to the front.

¶ Modigliani, an Italian youth, who lived and painted in Paris for about three years, died in 1920, starving and unrecognized. To-day his canvases and drawings are eagerly sought in Paris and London. Critics and collectors consider him a great artist. His provocative and commanding personality is apparent on the merest glance at his work.

¶ Signac is one of the leaders of the Pointillists. His work is so widely known as to need no comment.

¶ Soudeikine is a famous Russian whose canvases were shown in the Brooklyn exhibition of Russian painters. He was one of the decorators for The Chauve Souris.

¶ Sprinchorn is by birth a Swede. He has studied, lives and paints in America. He has had one-man shows at The Worcester Museum and elsewhere.

¶ Stella, an Italian, living in this country, is well known.

¶ Zadkine is a Russian residing in Paris. The Barnes collection contains a number of examples of Zadkine's interesting work. He is better known as sculptor than as painter.

The New Gallery opened its doors at 600 Madison Avenue, New York City, on November 14, 1922. The aims of its organizers were stated in an announcement to its friends, from which the following is quoted:

"Though we shall show the works of those who have definitely arrived, we wish in the main to be explorers; to discover hidden treasure; and it is because we believe that you have the discernment and courage to value pictures, not names, that we send you this announcement.

"In Paris, the 'amateur,' as you know, is the collector who buys the pictures he loves. He hangs them on his walls and draws dozen daily dividends of pleasure. Forty years ago he bought Manet and Monet; twenty years ago, Cézanne, Gauguin and Van Gogh.

"He enjoys the sensation of having backed his judgment and won; still more is he glad to make it possible for the artist to live, to create, and to gain recognition."

That the belief of organizers of the Gallery in the existence of a body of American amateurs, glad to make it possible for the artist "to live, to create and to gain recognition," was not entirely unfounded, has been fairly well shown in the number of sales made. This result, however, could not have been achieved but for the coöperation of the artist. By coöperation is meant the readiness to sell pictures at moderate prices. For example, the second exhibition at The New Gallery, held in December, 1922, was the One Hundred Dollar Exhibition, in which the works of forty painters were shown, among them Pamela Bianco, Biddle, Ederheimer, Feder, Grigoriev, Hartley, Hartman, Kisling, Modigliani, Mary Rogers, Soudeikine, Zadkine.

No greater service can be rendered the cause of living art than to convince the living artist that price and value are not interdependent. Far too many artists are in a state of hopeless mental fog on this subject. However pressed financially, many an artist fears to sell his pictures at low prices lest the quality of his art for that reason may be underrated. If this false idea can be plucked from the mind of the artist of to-day, if he can be made to realize that what he requires is to have his pictures hang on the walls of owners, that the question of price is a matter of secondary importance; if he can be brought to have the same point of view toward his picture as the poet has toward his sonnet, a real good will have been accomplished.

To this spirit, which a number of the most earnest and most worth-while of to-day's painters have displayed, the American amateur has responded. At the beginning of the year 1923 The New Gallery organized a club known as The New Gallery Art Club. Membership in this club costs $100 and entitles the member to a credit of that amount to be used in the purchase of pictures. The artists who exhibit at The New Gallery are artist members of the club. Thus a point of contact is found for amateur and painter. The casual cynic will say that The New Gallery Art Club is a selling device. Let it go at that. It is frankly a plan of the directors of The New Gallery Art Club to create a public which will buy pictures, for if the artist is willing to sell at moderate prices, let it be remembered that artists get little pleasure from laurel wreaths and less from ornamental tombstones, and that they too must earn enough money to buy bread, to say nothing of canvas and paint. The New Gallery makes no concealment of the fact that it means to continue in its efforts to encourage those living artists who are not merely clever imitators, skilful draftsmen, facile copyists, but who are laboriously and bravely working out their own problems, nor does it make a secret of the fact that one of the purposes in the creation of The New Gallery Art Club has been to enable those men and women who sympathize with the views of the Gallery to form a society which shall help to accomplish these ends.

An appendix contains a chronology of The New Gallery and The New Gallery Art Club activities, a list of members of The New Gallery Art Club, a list of exhibitors during the past season, and the names of officers and directors of The New Gallery.

In concluding this foreword, grateful mention should be made of Mr. Aaron Naumburg, without whose generous support The New Gallery would not have come into existence.
